Drought and Irrigation.

The writer has always said that every farmer should have a few acres irrigated to fall back on in case of drought. We shall yet be driven to it. One acre properly irrigated can produce about as much as ten acres under ordinary cultivation. A man out in Nebraska has discovered the best plan of all for such a region as ours. He dug holes about ten feet deep and a yard square, or two small spaces, about one yard apart and filled them up with top soil, replacing where he took it out with the earth dug out of the holes. All these holes being filled with this top soil a match. He found that all the rainfall went into these holes and penetrated through the porous parts and in the driest time remained moist and green. Then he treated his cornstems so that they got all the rains of last spring and now while the whole region is a parched desert there four acres are a green oasis with the finest crops on them ever seen in spite of the hot winds. He has called upon the governor of Nebraska to get a company and visit his place. We suppose ditches dug along and after the same way leaving spaces between will answer the same purpose. A general cultivation of the land would render the hot winds harmless. For it is well known where these winds pass through forests and over marshes that the crops immediately north of such places are not affected by the hot winds, because these winds have absorbed considerable moisture from the trees and marshes. It is the extreme aridity of these winds that fees the damage.

The supreme court of this state decides as follows regarding obstructions on streets: No one has the right in the management of business, whatever its character nor how necessary and convenient it may be to constantly for any considerable portion of time, use the street in front of the premises for the deposit of goods and thus interfere with its legitimate use. Municipal corporations are bound to keep their streets and highways in a proper state of repair and free from obstructions, so that they will be reasonably safe for travel, and if, having notice of defects and obstructions, they neglect to remove them, they will be liable for all injuries, provided that he who received the injury was himself at the time in the exercise of due care.

A new variety of swindler is at large in the land. He represents himself as a traveling agent for a large printing concern, and agrees to work for less than the cost of the paper used in the job. After receiving the order, which of course must be signed, not for publication, but as a means of identification, he proceeds to make the necessary charges so that the order makes a net. Thus he disposes of to some bank and in due time it reaches the maker. Better avoid all such fellows and come to THE SENTINEL office for your printing.
